Endogenous Transport Networks

Pablo D. Fajgelbaum  Edouard Schaal

UCLA & NBER  NYU

February 15, 2016

Abstract

We develop a new theory of transport networks and study its implications for trade and growth. Given arbitrary demand and supply patterns, the model gives rise to endogenous bilateral trade costs. We first show how different spatial configurations of output and demand give rise to different types of networks. We determine conditions under which the ensuing network features spatial distributions of price gaps and employment that correspond to what is observed empirically.